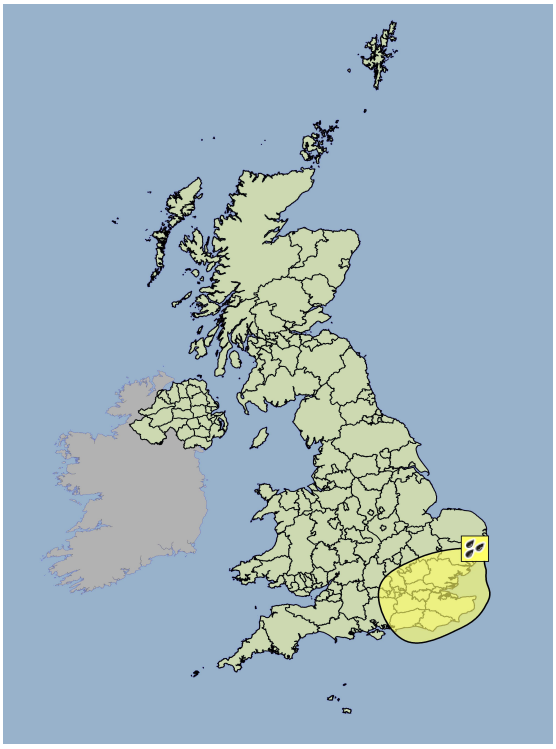
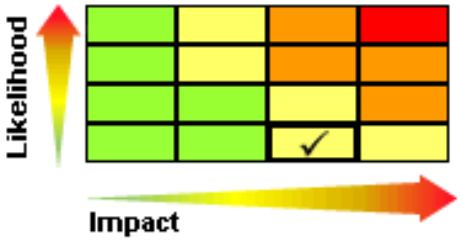
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A deeply unstable airmass will cover southeastern areas of England on Monday. Although some isolated downpours may occur in the early hours of Monday, the main risk will be during the day as temperatures rise, triggering further heavy showers and thunderstorms. These may become focused into slow-moving narrow bands, meaning that whilst some areas experience locally intense downpours giving up to 25 mm in an hour, adjacent areas could stay dry.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 01:00 on Mon, 28th Jul 2014 until 19:00 on Mon, 28th Jul 2014

Heavy thundery showers are expected across parts of East Anglia and southeast England, including the London area, at times on Monday.

During the early hours of Monday isolated thundery downpours may occur. However, later on Monday morning and through Monday afternoon, further thunderstorms are likely to develop. Where they do occur they will be slow-moving and perhaps accompanied by hail. The public should be aware of the risk of localised surface water flooding, especially if the downpours affect urban areas.

As often happens in such situations, many places could miss the worst of the downpours, The showers should due out quite quickly in the evening.
